Remember the emergence of translation software? It's introduction to the marketplace at some point during the turn of the 21st Century was considered a technological breakthrough and a useful innovation. Clearly, there were measurable benefits to having a meaningful conversation with individuals who speak little if any English. Obviously, this technology simplified communication tasks. Some could convincingly argue that, by bridging the vast language barriers between us, it in some way served to bring the world closer together.

The next evolutionary step would be the introduction of real time software that instantly translates the language you're speaking into another language during the conversation. Samsung introduces its Galaxy S24 series of smartphones capable of real-time translation in over a dozen languages including: Korean, Polish and Spanish. You'll see a transcript appear on the screen and hear a robotic voice repeat what you said in the other language for the caller and hear the same voice on your end translating the other side.

Tests conducted worked quite well although with a little lag time. The arena of software hasn't been Samsung's specialty. Though this particular translation software is an exception and some may find it useful for business purposes.
